with the Elements of Photoshop Photoshop is a full-blown, powerful image manipulation program that can be used for professional work. But because of its size and resource requirements, professionals tend to use other image manipulation programs as well. If you plan to work with Photoshop on a regular basis, you need to know the basics of it. The following sections provide an overview of how to use Photoshop. This chapter focuses on Elements 12, which is Photoshop's newest version. For a more in-depth look at working with Photoshop, see Chapters 5 and 6. Finding your way around Photoshop Photoshop has three modes of display, which make it easy for you to use the program without getting lost in a sea of features. Mode choices include the following options:

Browse: Using this mode, you can see an example of the finished image (such as the one shown in the figure at the beginning of this chapter). This mode works only for images that you create.

Expert: This mode enables you to work with the full set of tools in the program — from raster editing to the addition of special effects, and so on. This mode enables you to view an example of the final results as well, but it does not display the image in its original form; you instead view an image that you create by using the tools in the program. Normal: This mode displays the image as it appears in the original document, which is how it was when you first opened the document. This mode is what you will use most of the time. Figure 1-3 shows the various modes in a compact window, available as a thumbnail when you first use

Choose either Browse or Expert view, or Normal view to see the image without editing. Fortunately, you can go back and forth between the three modes by using the Q: How do I run a powershell script without dumping all the debug output to the screen?

My Windows server 2008 installation of powershell outputs a lot of debug messages to the console window (the PS window) while it is running. For example, when I run a script that dumps the values of variables, it prints a good deal of information out that is not really helpful to me. I'd like to know how to configure powershell to dump the information to a log file and/or a text box in the PS window. I'm a bit of a PowerShell nube so forgive me if this is an easy question.

I found the following: Exit-
