discussion on a small campus TV talk show. We covered a wide range of topics, ranging from minor to major, and included an excerpt from the ancient philosopher Diogenes, who opined, "Those who are rich should give to those who are poor, and those who are poor should give to those who are rich." One woman stood up to say she disagreed with Diogenes, "I don't agree with that!" I paused because I was struck by her assertion. I was then reminded of the credo of a prominent Silicon Valley venture capitalist I met a few years earlier: "The rule in my venture capital firm: 'All means all, and all means no.'" I don't want to start a discussion on the ethics of fundraising, but I do think that there is wisdom in our community's recent conversation about the gender pay gap and the way in which people in our community came to terms with the fact that it is a serious issue. I also believe there is a lesson for us here in fundraising. We've heard that the most direct way for us to address the gender pay gap is to cut men out of the college recruiting game. We've heard about how we need to increase the number of women in fundraising, because if we don't, we'll simply never break even. Some of us have even been told we must do everything we can to stop any further discussions of the merits of the pay gap. However, I'm not advocating that these conversations simply stop. We may not have the same goal
