The role of the hypothalamic-pituitary-thyroid axis in the development of angiotensin II-induced hypertension in rats. The present study was undertaken to evaluate the role of thyroid hormones in the pathogenesis of angiotensin II (A II) hypertension in the rat. The administration of A II to intact rats resulted in a marked rise in blood pressure, which was associated with an increase in the plasma concentration of T3. In contrast, thyroidectomy reduced T3 levels and the rise in blood pressure induced by A II. The physiological increase in the blood levels of T4 and T3 in response to A II was also decreased in thyroidectomized rats. When A II was administered together with T4, the rise in blood pressure was not altered by thyroidectomy. Administration of triiodothyronine to thyroidectomized rats restored the response of T4 and T3 to A II. However, when A II was administered to thyroidectomized rats whose thyroids had been previously treated with propylthiouracil (PTU) to inhibit the peripheral conversion of T4 to T3, the rise in blood pressure induced by A II was not modified. The results indicate that thyroid hormones are not a prerequisite for the A II hypertension induced by this peptide. However, the physiological increase in plasma concentrations of T3, T4 and of T4 and T3 in response to A II is influenced by pituitary thyroid hormones, although other mechanisms also contribute to this response. The effect of thyroid hormones on blood pressure is probably mediated by their action on the central nervous system. Women infected with the HIV virus made no changes to their diet in the weeks prior to conception, and did not have a healthier diet during the weeks before conception, according to new research from Yale University School of Medicine and the Yale Center for Analytical Comparative Effectiveness Research. The results will be published today in the Journal of Infectious Diseases. HIV has been identified as the etiologic agent underlying 40 percent of all fetal deaths in the United States. Women infected with HIV are at risk of HIV vertical transmission, and one-third of all women in the United States diagnosed with HIV are on antiretroviral therapy, which provides good control of viral load and, thus, reduces the possibility of vertical transmission. Since babies are born during the peak of infection, newborns are in danger of contracting HIV, even in the absence of maternal transmission. Many studies

And I'm really sad to leave because I'm going to cry.
