phosphorylation of protein kinase c substrate-2-nitrobenzoxadiazole conjugate in intact and permeabilized cells. staurosporine inhibited the cytosolic protein kinase c (pkc) activity of permeabilized cells, but induced only minimal changes in pkc activity of intact cells. in permeabilized cells preincubated with staurosporine, staurosporine analogs and a protein kinase c substrate peptide, staurosporine and staurosporine analogs effectively inhibited pkc activity with potencies similar to those of the unmodified compounds. these results indicate that staurosporine inhibits pkc at the catalytic site and that the inhibitor appears to be an activator of pkc rather than a substrate analogue. the in vivo effect of staurosporine was studied using [32p]2-nitrobenzoxadiazole-peptide (nbd-substrate-2) conjugate as a substrate for pkc. in permeabilized cells, staurosporine enhanced the phosphorylation of nbd-substrate-2. however, this effect was only evident at concentrations of staurosporine that are ineffective as inhibitors of pkc in intact cells. staurosporine was therefore able to phosphorylate pkc substrate in permeabilized cells, but the effect was much lower than that observed with endogenous pkc. these results suggest that the phosphorylation of pkc substrate-2 in permeabilized cells requires the presence of both intact membrane and intact pkc. role of p53 in the regulation of microglial migration. under pathological conditions microglia can become activated and participate in inflammation, neurodegeneration and the immune response.
